So a friend of mine told me if I was ever on Bainbridge Island in Puget Sound Washington, that I should try the Streamliner Diner.

This evening I looked up where it was, and found that the East Shore of Bainbridge Island is a little over seven miles across Puget Sound from the Seattle Waterfront.

I wanted to get a night shot of the Seattle Skyline, so I drove to Bainbridge Island to see if I could locate a spot to get a view of Seattle. I was not too surprised to find that the shoreline of the island had beautiful homes covering every nook and cranny. I couldn't just walk into someone's back yard at night and start snapping pictures, so I scoured the coastline to see if I could find a little opening.

I found a gigantic opening at the Southern Point of Eagle Harbor. It was what appeared to be a prime location with a spectacular view, yet I wondered why it hadn't been developed.

It didn't take too long to figure it out. I drove down a little road to the waterfront and at the end of the road was a fenced area with razor wire around the top. The sign on the fence said it was an Environmental Protection Agency Superfund Cleanup Site, and to stay away because it was dangerously contaminated. The name of the little road was also an indicator – Creosote Pine Road.

Well I snapped some pictures and vacated the premises.

So, you must be wondering how the Streamliner Diner was?

I don't know. Apparently it's only open for breakfast & lunch.
