Hello from the Pacific Northwest.

In order to complete this multi-city postcard chain, I felt obliged to attempt to get a worthy image. I narrowed it down to two, but instead of picking between them, I'll just send them both. Moon Over Oyster Bay was taken from my hotel room before dawn yesterday, and Mount Rainier Sunrise was taken on my way to work this morning.

I'm off to my final destination very early tomorrow. I'm going home. This trip had me working on three separate unrelated projects, has taken me to five destinations, three of which were corner states (California, Florida & Washington) and I'll have crossed the continent four times by the time I get home. That's a record for me that I hope I never break.

I hope you've enjoyed viewing the postcards as much as I've enjoyed creating them.

By the way, the Sand Gnat postcard from the other day generated more replies than any other I've sent. Let me clarify for those who haven't already figured it out:

The story is true, but the sand gnat picture was manufactured. Many thought they didn't get the picture, but if you look closely, there is a single black dot just left of center on a white background. The story describes them as so small they are invisible. The picture was a joke. I couldn't find anything to take a picture of in St. Mary's Georgia during the two days I was there.

Here is a link to a picture of a sand gnat (it has many different names). It's on someone's little finger. Those of you who have been under a sand gnat attack understand just how much size doesn't matter.
