The first time I visited Salt Lake City was in November 1986. It snowed several inches while I was there.

The one image that has always stuck with me from that trip was when I returned to the airport, I caught a view of the city skyline, with the snow covered mountains rising up behind it. It was a testament to the reality that no matter how big we build things, they aren't really big at all.

It was well over a decade before I got back to Salt Lake City, and I've been there several times since. I've never been able to get the same view again, I think because of changes in the skyline between the city and the airport.

I snapped these while landing yesterday. The Wasatch Mountains run North-South and Salt Lake City is on the West side. In the city image, all you are seeing is the base of the mountains.
