Hello.

It's been a while since I last sent a postcard, people were beginning to wonder if I was dead. I've still been travelling, just short trips with no time to wander.

But today, I am in Texas on the Gulf Coast, and saw some pretty spectacular views in the sky.

The marsh grasses along the coast were on fire creating massive clouds of smoke, coupled with a heavy storm. Lightning was striking all around, but I couldn't capture any on camera (not fast enough). It looked like tornado weather, but I think it was the smoke that made it look so dark. Then when the rains came, it must have doused much of the fire, the smoke was much less obtrusive when the rain ended.

Seems kind of dangerous to have flames in an area that is heavily laden with petroleum.

That's it. Hope all is well with you.

Cheers,
G.
